

NEW

Introducing a New Series from Ashgate...

Green Criminology

Series Editors: Michael J. Lynch, University of South Florida and Paul B. Stretesky, University of Colorado, Denver

Now two decades old, green criminology—the study of environmental harm, crime, law, regulation, victimization and justice—has increasing relevance to contemporary problems at local, national, and international levels. This series comes at a time when societies and governments worldwide seek new ways to alleviate and deal with the consequences of various environmental harms as they relate to humans, non-human animals, plant species, and the ecosystem and its components. Green criminology offers a unique theoretical perspective on how human behavior causes and exacerbates environmental conditions that threaten the planet's viability. Volumes in the series will consider such topics and controversies as corporate environmental crime, the complicity of international financial institutions, state-sponsored environmental destruction, and the role of non-governmental organizations in addressing environmental harms. Titles will also examine the intersections between green criminology and other branches of criminology and other areas of law, such as human rights and national security. The series will be international in scope, investigating environmental crime in specific countries as well as comparatively and globally. By bringing together a diverse body of research on all aspects of this subject, the series will make a significant contribution to our understanding of the dynamics between the natural world and the quite imperfect human world, and will set the stage for the future study in this growing area of concern.

Queries and proposals for this series may be directed to:

Michael J. Lynch, Department of Criminology, College of Behavioral and Community Science, University of South Florida, mlynch@bcs.usf.edu
Paul B. Stretesky, School of Public Affairs, University of Colorado, Denver, paul.stretesky@ucdenver.edu
Eric Levy, Commissioning Editor, Law and Legal Studies, Ashgate Publishing,
elvy@ashgate.com

www.ashgate.com